

HR Brief

Human Resources tips brought to you by eESI

July 2018

IQ or EQ: What's More Valuable to Your Company?

The smartest person is usually considered the best person for a job, especially when it comes to leadership. However, HR experts argue that traditional intelligence (book smarts) may not be as important as emotional intelligence (people smarts).

What is Emotional Intelligence?

Emotional intelligence (EQ, or emotional quotient) can be summed up by a few characteristics:

- The ability to evaluate one's own emotions and their greater impact
- Solid understanding of one's abilities and self-worth
- An innate desire to help toward the greater good

In other words, having a high EQ means you work well with others because you understand how your and your co-workers' emotions affect each other. The argument goes: if our behavior is dictated by our emotions, then understanding them is the key to long-term success.

Making Emotions Work for You

Leaders who understand emotions can channel that energy into producing desired results. For instance, managing employees is much easier when you can empathize and understand them on an emotional level. Nothing builds barriers faster than a perceived misunderstanding from a manager.

Considerations

Overall, EQ is a fluid area of study, like most aspects of the brain. There are still many unknowns, so one cannot definitively say if emotional intelligence is the trump card for leaders. However, raising the EQ of managers even slightly can help with employee relations.

Consider offering EQ training to managers to help them relate better with their employees. You may be surprised how far a little emotional understanding can go.

DID YOU KNOW?

The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) is now in effect. This regulation affects U.S. businesses that have international ties.

The GDPR provides individuals with more control over their personal data.

Failing to comply with the GDPR can mean millions in fines. Speak with us to learn more about how this regulation may impact you.

Ignoring Diversity Training? You Should Reconsider

Starbucks made national news in May when it closed over 8,000 stores so its employees could undergo diversity training.

The training was in response to an incident where police were inappropriately called on two black men who were sitting peacefully in the store.

The incident sparked a national conversation about race and caused many companies to reassess their diversity training efforts, none wanting to be part of a future headline.

Make sure employees are properly trained so customers and members of the community can enjoy a pleasurable experience with your company.

